Reflecting the Past and Envisioning the Future:
Understanding Asian & African Communication

Abstract

This study endeavours to undertake a comprehensive exploration of the decolonization process within Asian and African communication theories and paradigms that have emerged in the aftermath of World War II. By delving into the realm of traditional folk media and its relationship with the development of rural communities in select countries, this research aims to shed light on the profound impact of indigenous knowledge, cultural practices, and alternative modes of communication within these unique cultural spaces. This way we shall reclaim the voices of Asians and Africans within the expansive field of communication studies but also acknowledge their invaluable contributions. To achieve these goals, a multi-disciplinary approach will be employed, drawing upon insights from esteemed media scholars, linguists, semioticians, and proponents of indigenous knowledge systems. Through this nuanced exploration, the study seeks to unravel the intricate tapestry of decolonized communication theories and practices, championing diversity, inclusivity, and authentic representation. The methodology will be review analysis of scholarly papers, journal articles, conference proceedings, and relevant publications to identify existing research and theoretical frameworks related to decolonization, Asian and African communication theories, and paradigms. We will then conduct a rigorous analysis of the selected papers using qualitative research methods. Identifying recurring themes, theoretical perspectives, methodological approaches within the papers will be our focus. Based on the analysis and synthesis of the reviewed papers, provide recommendations for further research and practice. Also, identify areas that require additional exploration and propose future directions for decolonized communication studies in Asian and African contexts.

Key words: Asian and African Theories, Semiotic Traditions, Traditional folk media, effective communication, community development, Decolonization

Abstract

The aim of this study is to conduct a comparative and comprehensive evaluation of the extraction and growth potentiality of Datura stramonium. L for chromium and lead. The seed germination test was conducted in the presence of lead (Pb) and chromium (Cr) at 10 ppm, 25 ppm, and 50 ppm concentrations. Bioaccumulation of Pb and Cr in plant tissue was analyzed to determine the morphological factors, photosynthetic pigments, peroxidase enzyme activity and the presence of organic compounds in Datura stramonium. L. The results of the study showed that there is no significant difference between the growth parameters of control and 10 ppm concentration of Pb and Cr. Whereas with an increase in the concentration of heavy metals (Pb and Cr; 25 and 50 ppm), there is a decrease in photosynthetic pigment, bioaccumulation, and translocation factor. Maximum tolerance index (TI) and relative germination rate were observed 92% and 1.0 respectively at 10 ppm Pb and Cr concentration. In FTIR analysis, revealed that the presence of charged functional groups that bind with respective metal ions to decontaminate soil and land. The study revealed that Datura stramonium. L can easily germinate in Cr and Pb-contaminated soil and can be a suitable candidate as an excluder for Cr and Pb-contaminated soil.

Keywords. Datura stramonium. L, FTIR, Seed germination, Bioaccumulation factor, Tolerance index, Peroxidase enzyme activity.

Abstract

Microbial extracellular polymeric substances (EPS) excreted from microorganisms are complex mixture of proteins and polysaccharides played important roles in physiological, environmental, agriculture, health, catalytic nano-bio-composites, commercial and industrial applications. The carbon dioxide (CO₂) sequestering bacterium Serratia sp. ISTD04 was used for enhanced production of EPS in presence of increasing concentration of sodium bicarbonate and calcium chloride produced 3.9 g/100ml. Organic matrices isolated from bacterium grown on synthetic medium in the presence or absence of calcium ions indicated formation of biomineralized products influenced the biofilm production and higher level of protein synthesis with EPS production. Genomic analysis indicated 8 putative genes clusters responsible for lipopolysaccharide, stewartan, emulsan, polysaccharide B, capsular polysaccharide and fatty acid-saccharide production in EPS synthesis in bacterium. The morphology of bacterium and elemental composition of EPS was characterized by SEM-EDX. The functional groups, monomer composition, linkage analysis and structure of purified EPS was characterized by FTIR, GC-MS and ¹H and ¹³C NMR. Glucose, galactose, mannose and glucosamine were the monomers detected in the EPS. EPS was applied for bioflocculation (kaolin test), dye removal showed 68% ± 0.9 flocculating activity and decolorized cationic dye acridine orange (80%) and crystal violet (95%). The presence of emerging contaminants in sewage sludge indicated presence of wide range of organic compounds was degraded effectively after fabrication of EPS-based catalytic nano-biocomposite materials. The EPS was further applied for preparation of cosmetics and drug formulation will be demonstrated. The results highlighted CO₂ sequestration and enhanced EPS production potential of Serratia sp. ISTD04, can be harnessed in future applications.

Alternative splicing (AS) is a key post-transcriptional modification that helps in increasing protein diversity. Almost 90% of the protein-coding genes in humans are known to undergo AS and code for different transcripts. Herein, we have developed a pipeline, Finding Alternative Splicing Events (FASE), as the R package (Available @ <https://github.com/harshsharma-cb/FASE>). The pipeline is based on differential alternative splicing events and predicts the transcript structure and their concentration along with survival analysis. This is the first kind of pipeline that takes advantage of differential alternative splicing events for finding novel transcripts that are neglected due to low expression in transcript level statistical analysis.

To predict the correct structure of expressed transcripts in given conditions, FASE combines the AS events with the information of exons, introns and junctions using graph theory. The estimated concentration of predicted transcripts is reported as the relative expression in terms of log₂CPM. Using FASE, we were able to identify several unique transcripts of EMILIN1 and SLK genes in the TCGA-BRCA data, which were validated using RT-PCR. The experimental study demonstrated consistent results, which signify the high accuracy and precision of the developed methods.

In conclusion, the developed pipeline, FASE, can efficiently predict novel transcripts that are missed in general transcript-level differential expression analysis. It can be applied selectively from a single gene to simple or complex genome even in multiple experimental conditions for the identification of differential AS-based biomarkers, prognostic targets, and novel therapeutics.

Comparison of Three and Four Frequency Pure Tone Average for Different Outcomes Measures in Interpretation of Presbycusis

Abstract

Introduction:

Presbycusis refers to bilateral age-related hearing loss. Old hearing loss or Elderly hearing loss becomes noticeable at 60 years of age. Presbycusis is divided into 6 categories that are sensory, neural, stria, mechanical, mixed, and intermediate Presbycusis. Pathophysiological factors affecting Presbycusis-related hearing impairment are the factors which are genetic, ototoxic, noise exposure factors & hormonal factors. Audiology clinics traditionally use one of the first diagnostic tests to evaluate hearing adults with pure tone audiometry (Musiek et al 2017) which is the gold standard hearing test. A common method of summarizing pure tone average for pure tone audiometry findings is the arithmetic mean of each ear threshold at 500 Hz, 1000 Hz & 2000 Hz. The relationship between PTA and speech audiometry has also been of interest to audiologists so far (Hughson & Thompson, 1942; Carhart, 1971). Most organizations across communities don't specify PTA frequencies for diagnosing the severity of hearing loss like Korea, and Japan. But 4 frequency P.T.A average is suggested preferable for diagnosis (Hertfordshire Clinical Commissioning Group, U.K) especially when a good ear is poorer than 25 dBHL.

Need for the Study:

Presbycusis, age-related hearing loss, is a prevalent condition among the aging population. Accurate assessment and diagnosis are crucial for providing appropriate intervention and rehabilitation. The choice of audiometric protocols can impact the interpretation of presbycusis, affecting treatment decisions. Many clinics and audiologists use three-frequency and four-frequency pure tone averages, for writing the interpretation of hearing loss in older adults. This variability in practice raises questions about the consistency and reliability of these interpretations. By comparing the effects of three-frequency and four-frequency pure tone averages, this research addresses a significant gap in our understanding of hearing loss assessment in the aging population.

Aims & Objectives:

The study aimed to compare the interpretation of the Three-Frequency Pure Tone Average (3FPTA) and the Four-Frequency Pure Tone Average (4FPTA) among individuals with presbycusis. The objective is to investigate the clinical utility and practicality of using either the 3FPTA or 4FPTA in audiological assessments for individuals with p

Contralateral Suppression of TEOAEs in Adults with Autism Spectrum Disorder Using White Noise

Introduction

As per the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders—5th edition (DSM-5), autism spectrum disorder (ASD) is a neurodevelopmental disorder characterized by a deficit in social communication, social-emotional reciprocity, and hyper-hypo activity to sensory inputs (Hodges, Fealko et al. 2020). The other significant difficulties for children with ASD are failure to be involved in a reciprocal conversation and repetitive behaviors, interests, and activities (Hodges, Fealko et al. 2020).

The peripheral hearing of children with ASD is typically normal. It has been observed individuals with ASD often cover their ears whenever they are surrounded with unpleasant sound. Language and learning problems in ASD may be caused by abnormal sound perception and auditory processing abnormalities. Almost 18–40% of children with ASD are hypersensitive to loud noises which makes it difficult for them to focus on important auditory information (Collet, Roge et al. 1993, Maison, Micheyl et al. 2000).

The adequate auditory functioning depends upon integrity of afferent and efferent pathway. The efferent pathway runs parallel to afferent pathway. It is a neural pathway that transmits the signals from lower brainstem to cochlea via olivocochlear bundles. The efferent innervations are responsible for anti-masking and auditory processing in noisy situations. Assessment of auditory efferent function is typically rule out by contralateral suppression of otoacoustic emissions (OAEs). It is widely used to evaluate the medial olivocochlear (MOC) efferent system (Mertes and Leek 2016). All types of OAEs, such as spontaneous otoacoustic emissions (SOAEs), distortion-product otoacoustic emissions (DPOAEs), and transient-evoked otoacoustic emissions (TEOAEs), have been described as having contralateral suppression (Mertes and Leek 2016). Many other researchers also measured the suppressive activity of efferent fibers on OHCs by comparing evoked transient evoked otoacoustic emissions collected in quiet and in the presence of contralateral noise (Morlet, Goforth et al. 1999, Ellis 2004). Recording OAEs in the presence of noise is a non-invasive way to assess the suppressive effects of MOC on the OAE responses (Berlin, Hood et al. 1994, Giraud, Collet et al. 1995).

Need of the study

A previous study had investigated difference between contralateral suppression of DPOAEs in children with Asperges Syndrome and typical developing children (Kaf and D... 2012)

Satisfaction in hearing aid users by hearing aid programming using In-situ Audiometry threshold VS Conventional Audiometry thresholds

Introduction

Over the past decades, hearing aid design and selection have seen significant technological advancements, accompanied by the maturation of the audiology profession. These developments have led to substantial improvements in the process of fitting hearing aids. The protocol for adjusting the amplified sound of hearing aid to compensate the hearing loss of an individual is termed as hearing aid programming.

For conventional hearing aid programming pure tone hearing thresholds obtained by standard audiometer are typically used. Alternatively, hearing aid fittings can also be programmed by hearing thresholds obtained through digital hearing aids, which take into account an individual's unique ear canal anatomy. Hearing thresholds obtained by hearing aid is known as in-situ audiometry. In this method, the patient's hearing aid is used to deliver test stimuli directly to their ear (Kiessling et al., 2015). The fitting software utilizes the in-situ thresholds obtained during this process to calculate the target gain settings for an individual's hearing aid (Kuk, 2012). Conventional hearing aid programming presents numerous challenges for users, including issues such as feedback, occlusion effect, difficulty listening in noisy environments, trouble with telephone communication, and challenges in group conversations.

Feedback is one of the most frequent complaints of hearing aid users (Kochkin, 1993). Hearing aid feedback problems can cause discomfort and embarrassment for users. The occlusion effect is also a common concern among hearing aid users. It's particularly problematic for people with good low-frequency hearing, leading to discomfort and dissatisfaction. Listening in noisy environment is also challenging for hearing aid users (Alexander, 2021). Participating in group conversations is also difficult for hearing aid users. Background noise, multiple voices, and fast speaker changes can make it difficult to focus on one speaker, leading to comprehension difficulties. Hearing aid users often struggle with telephone conversations due to background noise; poor call quality, and distorted speech.

Spatial Planning within Environmental Policies and Legislation: An Ideology or A Reality?

Draft Abstract

Spatial Planning refers to the rational distribution of land use activities in space. Largely, the government and its functionaries influence past, present, and future distribution of land use activities at an Urban or regional level. The exercise of spatial planning is undertaken to balance the demand for development for attaining socio-economic growth without harming the environment or ecosystem. Hence, spatial planning regulates the conversion of land and its uses. Policy measures and legislative instruments can significantly affect the spatial planning process and conversion of land use. These two have the potential to address environmental issues systematically in the spatial development process. Given that, this paper aims to research the spatial pattern of development and regulatory violations therein (w.r.t. environment). A case study-based approach is taken to examine the implementation of environmental regulations at the local level in the spatial planning of an Indian metropolitan city i.e. Gurugram. The city is situated in the southern part of the state of Haryana and situated at the foothills of the Aravalli ranges. Documented literature and scientific research show that the Aravalli ranges are one of the oldest fold mountain ecosystems in India and the world. Therefore, it becomes imperative to study the spatial arrangement of development concerning environmental sustainability in the region. A cluster sampling approach is adopted to identify different zones within the city for examining the land use changes in accordance with applicable environmental compliance. Specifically, this study compares the land use design of comprehensive plans with subsequent development activity following environmental legislation and policies in place. Intergovernmental cooperation is a crucial role player in the environmentally effective spatial arrangement of land use activities. Some suggestions are provided for environmentally effective spatial planning by establishing a stronger link among regulatory provisions, plan design, and plan implementation.

Inter-Governmental Functionaries and Functions: An Institutional Framework for Environmental Governance in India

Abstract

Analyzing and theorization of environmental governance is a challenging endeavor, especially in a developing country like India. The involvement and dependencies of cross-sectoral departments made the task difficult as well as thought-provoking. The actors involved in the implementation of environmental governance at the local level in India are Town and Country Planning departments, Development Authorities, Block and Panchayat level officials, Forest departments, Agriculture departments, Irrigation and Water Resource departments. These institutions are conceptualized as interdependent units in the governance system. But they are usually not found well-coordinated and integrated into their practices. Given that, this research attempts to present an institutional framework hypothesizing how cross-sectoral institutions and their networking may influence environmental governance at the local level. It will theorize the inter-governmental functionaries, their functions, interests, organizational challenges, and the significance of network contacts within & across sectors for achieving integrated and sustainable resource governance. This research relies upon a rigorous literature review for developing the institutional framework, in-depth interviews with government officials designated at different levels in different departments, and a brainstorming exercise with policy experts to develop a performance index for government functionaries. A case study-based approach is adopted to examine the environmental governance process and its implementation at the local level. The district Gurugram in the state of Haryana has been selected as a sample study to understand the existing environmental governance system at the local level. In the end, it concludes and suggests considering cross-sectoral dynamics, administrative re-organization, and the development of a performance index for approaching successful environmental governance.
